Abstract: One of the U.S. Census Bureau's long-standing challenges has been counting migrant farm workers. Although the Bureau goes to great lengths to locate these individuals, its efforts are often hampered by the unconventional and hidden housing arrangements, distrust of outsiders, and language and literacy issues often associated with this population group. To help inform the planning for the 2010 Census, we were asked to review the adequacy of the Bureau's procedures for locating migrant farm workers and their dwellings during the 2000 Census, and the steps, if any, that the Bureau can take to improve those procedures.

"I have the greatest respect for farm workers", Governor Davis said in his veto message [AB 423]. "They do some of the most backbreaking work there is, and the fruits of their labor are vital to our economy. I also believe that most employers are responsible and law-abiding. And for those employers who ignore our laws or knowingly use contractors to avoid compliance with those laws, I believe in imposing the stiffest possible sanctions." -- [p. 9]

"Factories in the Field... transcends mere historical interest. Read in conversation and our collective history, with its time and place, and with its future and our present, it has much yet to tell us. The oranges and pears exported in 1939 have long since made their way back into the earth. Factories in the Field now goes out to shelves again, an imperishable and indispensable product of the California farms." - (p. xvii)

"One perennial feature of farm workers is diversity. Many people who share the label of 'farm worker' have very little in common. Most people who live on farms do not perform farm work, and most farm workers do not live on farms. To confuse matters further, not everyone who works in the agricultural industry has a farm worker occupation." -- (p. 10)

Report available full text via the World Wide Web:

"California is the nation's largest agricultural state. It produces more than 250 different crops valued at nearly $25 billion. Large numbers of recent immigrants from Mexico, Central America and Asia, many with low educational skills, provide a ready labor force. Farmworkers play a significant role in one of the state's most important industries. Their working conditions are difficult; they have low earnings, poor or no health benefits, substandard housing, physically taxing and sometimes unsafe work conditions, and long hours."

Executive summary: This report summarizes the findings of a pilot study intended to assess the health status of a representative cross-section of agricultural employees in California. Of special interest [was] health outcomes linked to occupational exposures. The pilot study combined self-reported information obtained from a personal interview normally conducted at each subject's residence with the results of a rudimentary physical examination, and utilized an innovative sampling strategy. This method entailed a household survey modified to include mapping and listing all temporary or unconventional living quarters utilized by employees who may migrate to find seasonal jobs. The sampling strategy was specifically designed to take account of the well established fact that a sizable share of U.S. hired farm workers, estimated to be two out of every five, migrate throughout the year in search of employment.

This is Report Number 8 in a series of publications based on the findings of the National Agricultural Workers Survey (NAWS), a nationwide, random survey on the demographic and employment characteristics of hired crop workers. This report, like those before it, finds that several long-standing trends characterizing the farm labor workforce and the farm labor market continue. It finds that farm-worker wages have stagnated, annual earnings remain below the poverty level, farmworkers experience chronic underemployment and that the farm workforce increasingly consists of young, single males who are recent immigrants. – (p. vii)

Introduction: They are essential, but invisible; mostly documented workers and citizens, but believed by many to be illegal; hardworking people, but viewed as undeserving. They are the hundreds of thousands of migrant and seasonal farmworkers who do the hard work of planting, tending and harvesting many of the crops that Americans expect to find at their grocery stores reasonably priced and unblemished. Because migrant and seasonal farmworkers move, because they are poor and because they are often from "minority" cultures, their concerns often receive low priority in the attention of the public and of social service and regulatory agencies. Standards of housing, working conditions and services established for other workers legally do not apply to them or fall through the cracks of enforcement.

FARMWORKERS / Housing Assistance Council -- Washington, DC: HAC, 1997.

Available full text via the World Wide Web:

Every year, migrant farmworkers uproot themselves and sometimes their families to travel hundreds of miles in search of work. Usually the compensation they receive for their hard labor is inadequate. Farmworkers are one of the poorest working groups in the United States. Not only do they lack sufficient pay, they also lack other necessities, such as health care, transportation, adequate education and decent housing.

The paper presents the results of a field study conducted in 1992 in Madera County, which was a follow-up to research initially conducted in Chavinda in the early 1980s. Field work consisted of ethnographic research and a survey of a random sample of families from Chavinda. Quantitative data (descriptive statistics) and qualitative information (case studies, interviews, & participant observation) are compared in this study to yield results of greater validity than either ethnography or a sample survey could provide alone.

[A] six-chapter book published by the Urban Institute Press that summarizes the papers presented at conferences in 1995 and 1996 that examined how immigration was changing the face or composition of the communities that house many of California's 800,000 to 900,000 farm workers. Cities such as Parlier and Guadalupe include some of the highest percentages of residents in poverty, the highest shares of immigrant farm workers and some of the fastest population growth in rural America. At the same time, the value of the commodities sold and of the farm land used to produce them has reached record levels.
